CITIZENSHIP & THE WORLD MAP

Regions, states and independent land, how new states are born, and how flight moves you across the map.

REGIONS AND STATES

The world is a real-world map divided into regions. Regions are grouped into states (countries), each with its own currency, treasury, tax rates, parliament and elected president. A region that belongs to no state is independent. Every region has a resource type (one of the seven raws: grain, cotton, timber, iron, coal, copper or oil). 100 of the 1,000 regions sit on a real-world deposit or growing region — Saudi oil, Pilbara iron, Chilean copper, the Corn Belt — and carry a resource bonus of up to +30% that boosts RAW production of that resource. The Resources map mode shows all of them.

> Beta note: not every region is open yet. Regions unlock as the beta progresses, and every region opens when the beta ends.

Scheduled openings. New territory opens on a schedule. When an opening is planned, a small lock chip in the bottom-right of the map counts down to it; hover it to see how many regions are coming. When the countdown reaches zero the regions open for play by themselves and the chip disappears.

Protected regions. Some regions carry a shield on the map, set by the game's staff for a fixed period. No war — land, naval or a rebellion — can be declared on a shielded region until the shield ends; the map card and the region panel show when. A shielded region that declares a war itself loses its shield the moment that war starts. See War & the Front.

CITIZENSHIP AND WORK RIGHTS

Your citizenship belongs to your native region: you are a citizen of the state that holds it — or of no state at all while that region is independent. Citizenship (or a work permit) grants the right to work in that country's companies. Work rights are re-checked on every shift: when a permit is revoked you keep your job, but you cannot work a shift there until you hold a new permit or the citizenship. To work a job you must also be physically in the company's region. In an independent region there is no state to ask — anyone standing there may work.

How to get a permit or change citizenship is on Travel, Permits & Moving Abroad.

BORDERS AND FLIGHT

Moving between regions takes a flight, which consumes a travel ticket and takes real time based on distance and the ticket tier:

$$\text{minutes} = \text{round}\big(10 + \text{km} \cdot 0.0235 \cdot f_{\text{tier}}\big)$$

Higher-tier tickets cut travel time sharply — the tier factor f_{tier} runs from 1.0 at T1 down to 0.25 at T5. You cannot work, fight or apply for citizenship while in flight. A flight cancelled mid-air leaves you where you took off, and the ticket is not refunded.

States can open or close their borders, which affects who may enter. Tickets are produced by player-run companies from oil, so travel is part of the economy like everything else.

INDEPENDENT REGIONS AND NEW STATES

Independent land has no government, no borders to close and no permits: anyone can fly in, and anyone standing there may work. Its citizens — its natives — belong to no state. They are notified when the region is attacked, and they can still trade on the global market (see Markets, Tax & FX). Becoming a citizen there is immediate: Apply for citizenship on the Politics tab of the region panel, under the usual once-every-7-days limit.

The same tab counts the region's citizens toward statehood. When a new citizen — or a rebel victory — brings an independent region to five active citizens, a new state forms there on its own. Inactive accounts don't count toward the five, but once the state forms, every citizen of the region joins it.

A state is also born when a parliament frees one of its regions with a Declare a region independent law (a two-thirds vote, see Parliament & Laws): the freed region becomes a new state at once, whatever its population, and its citizens become that state's citizens.

Every new state starts the same way: a democracy named after its region, with that region as its capital, USD as its currency and a grey colour on the map. Its first parliamentary election is scheduled at once, and the new parliament can rename the state and change its flag, colour and currency by law.

THE LAND CARRIES ITS PEOPLE

Citizenship belongs to your native region. Whoever controls that region is your state: when a region changes hands — by war, purchase or rebellion — every citizen of the region moves to the new owner at once (or becomes stateless after a rebel win, until a state forms). The presidency, cabinet seats and election candidacies held in the old state end with the citizenship; party memberships are left for you to leave.

A state that loses its last region dissolves: president, cabinet, parliament, parties, elections, laws, alliances, trade agreements, embargoes, work permits and pending citizenship applications are gone. Only its treasury gold passes to the conqueror.

In a region owned by a state with a government (a president or an interior minister), Become a native here files an application: the panel shows it as awaiting approval, and the president and interior minister are notified and decide on the Interior — Applications desk of the Parliament page. In an independent region, or a state without a government, citizenship is immediate. You can have one pending application at a time; to apply elsewhere, Withdraw application from the region panel first. An approval that arrives after you have already changed citizenship no longer moves you: it is refused while the 7-day cooldown runs, and dropped if you are already a citizen there.

INACTIVITY

An account nobody opens for 15 days is marked inactive. Opening the game is what counts — logging in once puts you back to active the same second, whether you play that day or not. Premium makes no difference: the rule is about presence, not payment.

Falling inactive costs you the seats you were keeping warm from others:

- every office you hold — the presidency or a dictator's seat (which restores democracy), a cabinet seat, your party's presidential nomination and any candidacy in an election that has not closed;
- your party: you leave it. A party you led passes to its secretary, or to its longest-standing member; a party whose last member goes inactive dissolves;
- your job: the post is freed for someone who will work it.

Nothing else is taken. Your companies keep running, their listings stay up, your gold, items, level, training and party history are untouched, and you keep your place in the rankings — the lists mark you with a small Inactive chip so everyone can see why the name has been quiet.

While you are inactive you count toward no population figure: the citizen count of your country, the population of your region, the state-formation threshold and the turnout a ballot is measured against are all figures about people who are here.

Coming back takes one login. The stamp clears, the chip disappears, and a notification at the top of your feed tells you exactly what the absence cost. Nothing is handed back automatically — a vacated office is filled by an election, and a job is applied for again.
