PARTIES & ELECTIONS

Political parties, the two-week election cycle, how parliament seats are won, the presidency, ideologies and the dictatorship.

POLITICAL PARTIES

Any citizen at level 10 or higher who is not already in a party can found one for 50 gold. A party carries:

- a name of 3–40 characters, unique within its country;
- an abbreviation of 2–5 letters or digits, unique across the whole world — the leader can change it for 50 gold, once every 30 days;
- a description of up to 500 characters, and a logo the leader uploads.

The region where the founder stands becomes the party's headquarters. A party belongs to its founder's country: only that country's citizens can join it, and a player can belong to only one party at a time.

Each party runs one of three membership modes, set by the leader:

- Open — any citizen of the country joins with one click. Every new party starts Open, and its founding is announced to every citizen of the country.
- Application — hopefuls apply; the leader or a secretary approves or rejects them, and the applicant is notified.
- Closed — no new members.

Parties have three roles:

- Leader — promotes members to secretary and demotes them, dismisses members, hands the leadership to another member (stepping down to secretary), names the party's presidential candidate, sets the membership mode, the logo, the name and the description, and can Address the party (see Government Offices & Elections).

- Secretary — handles applications.
- Member.

If the leader leaves, leadership passes to the earliest-joined secretary, or else the earliest member, and the candidate choice is cleared; the last member out dissolves the party. A leader whose account goes inactive is replaced the same way.

Members wear the party's [ABBR] tag before their name everywhere — a switch in Settings hides it — and every party gets a private chat room.

Party history. Every profile keeps a permanent party record: each party the player belonged to, the role they held, when they joined and left, and why — left, dismissed, party dissolved or inactive. It sits behind a small history button next to the player's current party. The record starts on 12 September 2026; earlier stints are not known.

THE ELECTION CYCLE

Democracies hold elections every 14 days. A new state's first parliamentary ballot opens at the first midnight (UTC) at least 72 hours after the state forms; after that, each parliamentary ballot opens 14 days after the previous one opened. Each cycle has two ballots, each open for 24 hours:

1. Parliamentary election — you vote for a party; any party of your country can be chosen. The results decide which parties enter parliament and how many seats each holds. If nobody votes, the sitting parliament stays as it is; a state that has no parliament yet holds the ballot again 3 days after it closes instead of waiting a full cycle.
2. Presidential election — opens 24 hours after the parliamentary ballot closes. Every party holding at least one seat when the ballot opens fields one candidate (the leader's pick — or the leader themself if none was named). The candidate with the most votes becomes president; a tie goes to the candidate whose party holds more seats. If the ballot draws no votes, the sitting president stays in office.

Parliament can also call elections early, by law: an early parliamentary election opens at once in place of the scheduled one and restarts the 14-day cycle from its own opening; an early presidential election opens a presidential ballot at once. See Parliament & Laws.

To vote you must have been a citizen of the country for at least 3 days, and you get one vote per ballot. Casting it asks you to confirm first — a vote cast cannot be changed. Becoming native of another region of the same country keeps that clock: only taking another country's citizenship starts it again.

Following another country's elections. The Elections page has a country picker: pick any country to watch its ballots, its candidates and the live tally as a spectator. Only that country's citizens vote there.

PARLIAMENT SEATS

Seats are distributed proportionally to each party's vote share (largest remainder method). A party with no votes wins no seats, and a tie for the last seat goes to the party with more votes, then to the older party. A parliament starts at 20 seats and can be resized to 40 or 60 by law.

A party's seats are filled by its leader, then its secretaries, then its members in joining order. If a party wins more seats than it has members, the extra seats stay vacant until new members join — and fill the moment they do.

THE PRESIDENCY

The elected president is the head of state. They appoint the cabinet, enact the laws their office covers without a vote — taxes, the notary fee, the currency, the capital, borders, immigration, diplomacy, export bans and war — work the interior and diplomatic-offers desks, address the nation and draw a daily salary. See Government Offices & Elections.

The presidency falls vacant when the president's account goes inactive (15 days away) or is erased; the next presidential election fills it.

IDEOLOGIES

A state may adopt one ideology by parliamentary law (Interior category):

- Nationalism — +10% battle damage for everyone fighting from the state's regions.
- Socialism — +15% output for every company in the state.
- Liberalism — −15% stat-training time in the state.
- Conservatism — +25% health regeneration in the state.

The bonus is flat, applies in every region the state owns, and stacks on top of the infrastructure indexes without depending on them — a state with no infrastructure still gets the full bonus. The ideology shows beside the regime on the country page and can change again 30 days after it is adopted.

REGIMES: DICTATORSHIP

Every state starts as a democracy. Once the sitting president has won three presidential elections in a row, parliament may vote to become a dictatorship (Regime category). A presidential ballot that nobody voted in keeps the president in office but is not a win — it breaks the streak. The law form shows how many wins in a row the president has so far.

The bar is the highest in the game: YES from two thirds of every eligible voter — the president plus all seat holders — with abstentions and silence counting as NO.

When it passes:

- The sitting president becomes the Leader.
- Parliament, the ministries and the election calendar end. Ministers lose their offices at once and are notified; open or scheduled elections are cancelled.
- The Leader rules by decree: any law the Leader signs takes effect immediately, with no vote, and nobody else can propose laws. The early-election laws do not exist; the ideology cooldown still applies.
- Every ministry desk (interior, economy, foreign affairs, diplomatic offers, defense) is served to the Leader, under "Leader's controls".
- The Leader is paid 20 gold per owned region per day; nobody else holds an office.
- Parties carry on, but there are no elections to contest.

A dictatorship ends in two ways: the Leader signs a Restore democracy decree, or the Leader's account is lost — erased, or inactive for 15 days. A ban alone does not end it. Either way the state returns to democracy and a parliamentary election opens at the first midnight (UTC) at least 72 hours later; the presidential round follows it as usual. After a decree the former Leader serves as president until then; after a lost account the presidency is vacant.

Both changes of regime are announced in the community Discord.
