TRAVEL, PERMITS & MOVING ABROAD

Flights and tickets, open and closed borders, work permits, and what changing your citizenship actually costs.

FLIGHTS

You move between regions by flight, paid with one ticket per flight — a manufactured good made from oil, traded on the markets like everything else. You book it from the Travel tab of a region's panel on the map: pick the ticket tier, and the panel tells you how long the flight takes before you start it.

- Flight time scales with real distance: 10 minutes base plus 2.35 minutes per 100 km.
- Higher-tier tickets fly faster: T2 cuts the distance part of the time to 75%, T3 to 55%, T4 to 38%, and T5 to a quarter (the 10-minute base stays).
- You can only fly to a region that is open for play.
- While in flight you cannot work, fight, take a job, found or move a company, or apply for citizenship. Your energy keeps regenerating at the pace of the region you left, and you land automatically.
- You can cancel mid-air: you stay in the region you took off from, and the ticket is not refunded.

New players start with 3 T1 tickets — enough to reach a job or a front.

BORDERS

Every state chooses whether its borders are open or closed (an Open / close borders law, or the foreign minister or president directly):

- Open — anyone can fly in.

- Closed — only citizens and holders of an approved work permit for that country get in (allies get no special entry), and keeping them closed burns supplies: 2 grain and 1 oil (food and fuel for the people and vehicles that guard them) per owned region per minute from the state stockpile. When the stockpile can't cover the next minute, the borders swing open on their own and the president is notified. Isolation is a siege you run against yourself.

The border is checked when a flight takes off, so closing it sends no one home: whoever is already inside stays. A work permit can be requested from anywhere, so the way into a closed country is to apply first and fly once the permit is approved.

Independent regions have no borders to close — anyone can always fly in.

WORK RIGHTS AND PERMITS

Being somewhere doesn't mean you may work there. A shift requires one of:

- Citizenship of the country, or
- an approved work permit for it.

In an independent region there is no state and no permit system: anyone standing there may work.

Applying. Open any region of the country on the map and use Apply for work permit on its Travel tab — you don't have to be there. You can hold two approved permits at a time. The Jobs page lists yours and lets you give one up with Cancel permit — a pending application too — which frees the slot. Becoming a citizen of a country retires your permit for it — a citizen needs none — and frees its slot too.

Who decides. Each state sets an immigration policy with a Set immigration policy law, or the interior minister or president directly:

- Automatic approval — applications approve instantly, and switching to it approves the applications already waiting.
- Manual review — the president or interior minister approves or rejects each application on the Interior — Applications desk of the Parliament page. Every state starts here. While a state has neither a president nor an interior minister, nobody can review, so applications approve instantly even under manual review.

Revoked permits. The same desk lists every active work permit, and the president or interior minister can Revoke one at any time. The holder is notified and keeps the job, but cannot work a shift there until they hold a new permit or the country's citizenship — work rights are re-checked on every shift. A revoked holder may apply again.

CHANGING CITIZENSHIP

Citizenship is your political home: it decides where you vote, which parliament you may sit in, and whose wars are listed as "yours". It does not pick your side on the front — there, you fight for whichever side holds the region you stand in.

- To become a citizen elsewhere you must physically be in the region (not in flight) and apply from the Politics tab of its panel: Become a native here in a state's region, Apply for citizenship in an independent one.
- In a state with a government — a president or an interior minister — that files an application for them to approve; anywhere else the change is immediate. You can have one pending application at a time: Withdraw application before applying somewhere else.
- Changes are limited to once every 7 days — a cooldown that keeps election-week mass migrations impossible. Moving your native region to another region of the same country counts toward the 7 days too, but it keeps your citizenship clock: the 3-day wait before a new citizen may vote does not restart.
- A move you did not choose — your home region conquered, sold, freed or taken by rebels — changes your state without touching your 7-day cooldown.
- Leaving a country ends any cabinet seat you hold there.
- In an independent region, five active citizens found a new state automatically — see Citizenship & the World Map.

> Moving abroad? Order matters: get a work permit (from anywhere) or fly there and apply for citizenship → be in the company's region → then take the job. And leave your old party first — memberships don't migrate with you.
